- 1. In today's competitive world, many families find it necessary for both parents to go out to work. While some say the children in these families benefit from the additional income, others feel they lack support because of their parents' absence.

In the past, a typical family consisted of a father who went out to work and a mother who stayed at home and looked after the children. Nowadays, it is a believed mandatory for both parents to work. Although situation of additional income help positively, still parent's absence cause problems. Here, I am going to discuss both sides of this development.

On the one hand, many reasons back up that the children of working parents are in an advantageous position, as their parents are able to afford basic needs such as new cloths, video games and study material. Further, proponents of this view argue that children are able to enjoy and experience the required support in becoming independent due to parents' extra wealth. Even, there remains always a feeling of future security inside of them because working parents always opt certain policies to deposit a portion of their income every month for children. To support, in India, mostly working parents have insurance policies, fixed deposits and gold investments for their children.

On the other hand, there are those who claim that when both parents work, their children due to the lack of enough support and attention might not do well at school because there is no one at house to provide support with things like homework or exam revision. Another consequence is that the absence of a parent at home could make it easier for children to get involved in bad fellowship of using drugs or undertake drinking.

In conclusion, I believe that both parents have to work nowadays, but if parents make time for their children in the evenings and at the weekends, then, the children will not suffer in any way. As a result, it must be stated that the extra income generated by both parents working, makes much higher standard of living, which benefits the whole family.
